USE & MAINTENANCE

It is recommended that coals and ashes are removed from your fireplace between each use. Coals and ash that build up can restrict air flow to the fire. MAKE SURE COALS AND ASH ARE COOL TO THE TOUCH BEFORE REMOVING.

If your fireplace gets wet, be sure to dry it. Wet ashes can promote rust formation. It is recommended that your fireplace be covered when not in use. NEVER COVER A HOT OR WARM FIREPLACE. Allow it to cool first.

This fireplace is not intended to be used for a primary heat source. Do not overfill it.

Steel and Cast Iron Surfaces

The temperatures produced by wood burning outdoor fireplaces can vary with the type and amount of combustible material being used. While formulated to withstand high temperatures, painted surfaces can fade, peel, and eventually rust due to the extreme, damaging heat that wood-burning fires can produce.

Comparable to the patina effect of copper and bronze, rust is the natural occurrence that results on surfaces that are not protected by paint or porcelain and are exposed to air and moisture. High-temperature paint can be used if the rustic appearance of your outdoor fireplace is not desired.

Outdoor fireplaces that feature a porcelain coating are still susceptible to rust spots on the screens. Fireplace mesh screens can not be porcelain coated and will require touch-up with paint that is rated for use in high-temperature applications.

Copper and other Metallic Surfaces

Copper, chrome and other metallic surfaces often found on outdoor fireplaces will patina, change color, and blacken with exposure to outdoor conditions, heat, and smoke. Cleaning these surfaces regularly after each use with an appropriate metal polish can help reduce these effects.
